

I missed most of the race due to a business trip. I happened to have an opportunity to do some SOLing on Thursday when one window was open, but started an hour and a half too late then.

I got back home on Friday, after a very heavy two-week work stint and a red-eye back to Europe just looking forward to sleeping. Then on Saturday we had a floorball tournament, which did not help resting. Still, as a proof of the addictive nature of SOL, I decided to take advantage of the apparently excellent window over Sat-Sun night, and it paid off! Fortunately the race did not involve heavy tacking or gybing, so I just set a DC for the start and woke an hour after the DC went off for the first rounding. Same pattern repeated until the end of the race, although I did not manage to sleep during the last stretch to the finish as the race was so tight between Varmint, captjack1942 and myself.
