

And one last time the fleet will have to traverse the Doldrums (a region of low pressure that envelopes the earth's oceans roughly at the equator, famous for thunderstorms, light winds, rain and sudden unexpected gusts). This particular crossing should be more straightforward than the previous three, as the fleet will already be lined up to cross at what is usually the narrowest point in the Atlantic.