

Once the fleet clear the Azores High, they will be heading north-west towards the Westerly Storm Track and into the path of low pressure systems spinning off the North American continent and heading for Europe. The behaviour of these systems will be critical in the approach to Newport. And given that we're still not far from the spring equinox – traditionally an unstable time of year – there's every chance of the fleet meeting some energetic weather.